Irlsh Landlords.

It appears to me, that within the lifetime of the present generation, acts have been perpetrated in the name of political economy, which would not be at all too strongly characterized by that ancient language of the Christian community. It happened, some years ago, that certain landlords in Ireland. became convinced that certain portions of land, it held by single farmers with capital, would yield more produce and more rent, for a given amount of labor, than if each divided amongst a considerable number of families. The conclusion, under certain circumstances, was a truth as reliable as any known astronomical fact which governs the compilers of the Nautical Almanae. But then came its conversion into a rule of action, the tacit assumption being that that procedure which would yield the greatest amount of wealth was legitimate, and might be adopted in disregard of every other consideration whatever. Portions of land, accordingly, which were in the occumation of of several were according to the common phrase cleared, with a view to consolidation of the holdings. In many cases, parties whose fathers and grandfathers had worn themselves out in toil upon the same land, and who clung to it, not only from affectionate remembrance, but because there seemed nothing else in the wide world between them and starvation, were thus reheart-rending grief, and with parents bed-ridden,

"Here my brother S- and I differ materially. in the same light; and they may disagree in opinion upon the simplest principal of law, while neither tible integrity, with settled habits of industry and socan conceive any earthly reason why they should. And this is merely because they look at different sides of the same subject, and do not view it in all its bearings.

"Now let us suppose, for the purpose of illustration, that a man shoul! come into this court room, with seeming violence. and holdly assert that my brother S-s head [here he laid his hand familiarly upon the large 'choucklehead' of his opponent] is a squash! I. on the other hand, should maintain, and with equal confidence, that it was a head. Now here would be a difference of opinion. We might argue till doomsday, and never agree. You often see men arguing upon subjects just empty and trifling as this! But a third person coming in, and looking at the neck and shoulders that supported it, would say at once to DeRosset & Brown; with mide. that I had reason for my side; for if it was not a head, it at least occupied the place of one-it stood where a head ought to be."

To Manage a Rearing Horse.

In preference to the dangerous experiment of pulling a rearing horse backward, I recommend the following method: - Whenever you perceive a horse's inclination to rear, separate your reins and prepare for him. The instant he is about to rise, slacken one hand, and bend or twist his head with the other, keeping your hands low. This bending compels him to move a hind leg, and of necessity brings his fore feet down. Instantly twist him completely round two or three times, which will confuse him very much, and completly throw him off his guard. The moment you cave finished twisting him round, place his head in the direction you wish to proceed, apply the spurs, tand he will not fail to go forward; if the situation be convenient, press him into a gallop, and apply the deduction is made according to quality. spors and whip two or three times severely. The horse will not, perhaps, be quite satisfied with the first de teat, but may feel disposed to try again for the masshall work for you, and wear our hands out, and you shall rest - and I remeber to have cried—and That they understood, and I proceeded to make the struggle he will be much more easier subdued than on ery. Should this be the case, you have only to twist the former occasion; in fact you will perceive him quail under the operation. It rarely happens that a rearing horse, after having been treated in the way described, will resort to his trick a hird time.
